Titan Of Construction Began As Time-Keeper, Was A World Leader Of Giant Projects, Master Tactician In Building, Quiet Man Who Dreamed Daringly

Erwin S. Wolfson, one of New York's most prominent skyscraper builders, died of cancer at his home in Purchase, N.Y., after an illness of two months. He was 60 years old.

His largest current project, the eight-sided Pan Am office tower being built over the railroad tracks behind Grand Central Terminal, will be the world's largest commercial office building, says the New York Times, with 2,400,000 square feet of floor space, when it is completed early next year.

Mr. Wolfson was also active in construction work in other cities. He recently started work on a $190,000,000 Gateway Center office complex in Chicago. Since 1957 Mr. Wolfson had been chairman of Diesel Construction Company, one of America's largest general contracting concerns.

He continued active supervision of his projects during his final illness. Within the last few weeks, although confined to his home most of the time, he used a helicopter to fly over the Pan Am Building and other local projects.

Introspective and laconic, he listened far better than he expounded, although he had a well concealed fascination with the intricacies of planning and erecting big buildings, says the New York Herald Tribune. Of the complex problems of planning the Pan Am, which he worked on since 1953, he would say simply, "problems are normal." Of future plans, he spoke hardly at all until all details were nailed down.

He distrusted the grandiose and pompous. He used few of the external symbols of success and rarely permitted himself generalities about his business or his life. Direct in speech and conservative in appearance, he reveled in hard fact rather than theory, although he retained a lifelong interest in education and cultural affairs that began when he majored in philosophy at the University of Cincinnati, from which he was graduated in 1924.

His building ventures were undertaken with little of the flamboyance often associated with real estate developments. Few outsiders knew of the intricate transactions for which Mr. Wolfson was respected as a master tactician in construction, leasing, and finance. Unlike many other real estate men, says the New York Herald Tribune, he operated as a lone investor, often in association with other wealthy individuals such as the late Ivor Clark.

He began his building career in 1924, when he bought two lots in Florida for $3,500. At the time he was 22 years old and was on vacation, having recently been graduated from the University of Cincinnati with a bachelor's degree in philosophy, says the New York Times. He had intended to become a teacher, but the Florida land-buying fever caught him.

He built a house that cost $6,500 on one of the two lots, sold it for $20,000, and went on from there to erect more homes, apartment houses, and small business buildings. Within two years, at the age of 24, he had amassed a small fortune. But the Florida land bubble burst and he lost everything he had made.

Though far from penniless he was the son of a prosperous clothing manufacturer in Cincinnati, where he was born March 27, 1902 —Mr. Wolfson decided to try his luck in New York. He took a job as the most junior assistant timekeeper on a construction crew building the twenty-eight storey skyscraper at 2 Park Avenue.

In the next ten years he worked his way up to become an officer of the Edelson Real Estate organization, directing construction of more than twenty large office buildings and other commercial structures. In 1936, he was one of a group that founded the Diesel Electric Company, now the Diesel Construction Company. Mr. Wolfson became president of Diesel in 1952 and chairman in 1957.

Parallel to his career in contracting, Mr. Wolfson developed his business as an investment builder, putting up structures in which he had a financial interest himself. Beginning at the close of World War II, he erected a series of office and apartment buildings that culminated in the Pan Am project, says the New York Times. He built, for his own account, nearly 6,000,000 square feet of office space in the city.

Among the more important office towers Mr. Wolfson built and owned, either alone or in partnership with others, were the block-square structure at 100 Church Street, another block-square building at 30 West Broadway; twin buildings at 579 and 589 Fifth Avenue; and the Bankers Trust Building at 529 Fifth Avenue. On the planning boards is still another block-square tower, to rise thirty-six stories, at 140 Broadway.

Outside New York, Mr. Wolfson had in the planning stage at his death office buildings in Philadelphia, Memphis, and Denver. The largest of his out-of-town projects was a $100,000,000 three-square-block complex of office and commercial buildings to rise over the railroad tracks at Chicago's Union Station.

Erwin Service Wolfson was one of the prime movers of the skyscraper building boom that changed the profile of Manhattan Island in a brief period since World War II. He had skill as a salesman—which he contended was the basic talent in his business—and the faith of others in his word.

Few persons who have been in the midtown Manhattan area during the last eight months could have failed to notice the 59-story Pam Am Building. Countless thousands of passers-by have stopped to watch each day as huge panels of concrete sheathing were hoisted into place on the massive steel skeleton. The building is expected to cost $100,000,000.

Unlike many of today's big construction projects, which are undertaken by combines linking the forces of several building companies, the Pan Am venture is a highly personal one.

Mr. Wolfson conceived the structure, he financed it himself by attracting British capital to the project when its size made conventional financing impractical, and he put his own contracting firm to work building it, says the New York Times. He personally negotiated the largest lease ever written for office space in Manhattan, renting fifteen floors of the building to Pan American World Airways—and saving more than a million dollars in brokerage commissions.

His all-embracing control of the biggest single office-building project ever undertaken fulfilled an ambition that Mr. Wolfson had held since his early days in the construction business.

In all, Mr. Wolfson and Diesel were identified with some sixty major construction projects since World War II in the New York metropolitan area. These include banks, hotels and department stores, as well as offices and apartment houses.

Diesel is presently involved as contractor in building the fifty-story Americana Hotel on Seventh Avenue, the tallest hotel in the world. The contracting company has a backlog of $265,000,000 worth of work across the country.

Mr. Wolfson had planned to undertake another giant project in New York, the $150,000,000 Washington Market redevelopment on the lower West Side. But he withdrew as sponsor last March when the project was attacked as a "windfall" by a civic group. Mr. Wolfson, who said the initiative for his participation in the project had come from city officials, declared that construction delays would make the entire venture unfeasible, says the New York Times. The city has not yet found another sponsor.

Though outwardly a soft-spoken man, Mr. Wolfson was driven to work hard at whatever project he pursued. At none of his ventures did he work harder than on the Pan Am Building—a project he determined to push through in spite of great difficulty and the likelihood that the rewards would be no larger than for any of a number of smaller construction efforts.

Mr. Wolfson, finding it impossible to arrange a big enough loan from banks, insurance companies or other financial institutions, struck out in a new direction. In what was regarded at the time—in 1959—as a major coup in realty financing, he induced a British realty concern to buy a half interest in his project for $25,000,000. It was the first large-scale foreign investment in a purely real estate venture in America.

As foundations for the octagon-shaped structure were laid between the railroad tracks, Mr. Wolfson turned to the next biggest part of the skyscraper job—renting the office space. Here again he scored a coup that amazed the real estate field. He sought out Pan American president Juan T. Trippe and the two men concluded a deal for the airline to lease 612,000 square feet in the building, about a quarter of the total space.

The lease, for twenty-five years and at a total rental of $115,500,000, was unusual in that it was directly negotiated, without the services of a real estate broker, says the New York Times. If brokers had been involved — and in deals of such magnitude frequently several interests are represented —the commissions could have amounted to more than $1,000,000.

Starting in the late Nineteen Forties, Mr. Wolfson maintained a thirty-acre estate in Purchase, where he kept a small stable of horses. Riding, playing tennis, and swimming kept him trim.

Mr. Wolfson built up a fortune reputedly well in excess of $15 million. He could, as an associate put it, "raise $5 million for a deal very quickly if he had to."

Mr. Wolfson had to raise that and more to finance the Pan Am building three years ago, taking an "enormous risk," as an associate said, at a time when there was no guaranty the venture would succeed. In 1960 he bought out his original partners, Herbert and Stuart Scheftel and Alfred Burger.

He was a trustee of the New School for Social Research, at which he took night courses in Russian history in 1960, and last year a night course in city planning and urban affairs. During the latter course he was treated to a blistering critique of his Pan Am Building by a lecturer unaware of his presence. (He waited until late in the talk to make his rebuttal.)

He also was a trustee of the Horace Mann School in New York, a private preparatory school; Pace College, and the Technion Institute of Engineering in Israel. He was a director of the Educational Facilities Laboratory of the Ford Foundation, and founder and president of the Academy of Religion and Mental Health.

In 1957 he founded a chair of philosophy at Brandeis University, in Waltham, Mass., in honor of a cousin, Dr. Harry A. Wolfson, then a professor at Harvard.

He spoke in Mid-Western accents that recalled his birth in Cincinnati. He was captain of the University of Cincinnati swimming team, and captain of the football team in his senior year when the team, on which he played end, was one of the powers of the local conference, says the New York Times. In 1961 he was honored with a Doctor of Laws degree awarded by his alma mater, the University of Cincinnati.

Mr. Wolfson was treasurer of the Hospital for Joint Diseases, and president of the Academy of Religion and Mental Health. He served as Democratic committeeman in the Town of Harrison, and as a member of the Westchester

W.Z.O. Head Charges Ben-Gurion Wants To Hurt Him

Dr. Nahum Goldmann, president of the World Zionist Organization, told the New York Times reporter in Jerusalem, Lawrence Fellows, that he believed Premier David Ben-Gurion deliberately wanted to damage his position by criticizing him for representations Dr. Goldmann had made on Israel's behalf.

The American Zionist leader declined to say whether he thought Premier Ben-Gurion wanted also to damage the World Zionist Organization to diminish the influence in Israeli affairs of Jews outside of Israel.

"That is for Mr. Ben-Gurion to say," Dr. Goldmann remarked. He spoke at a news conference in the headquarters of the Jewish Agency, executive body of the Zionist organization.

The Premier was reported to have charged at a Cabinet meeting that Dr. Goldmann was in effect interfering with Israel's conduct of her foreign affairs, sometimes to the detriment of Israel when the views he presents happen not to adhere to Israel's policy.

With the Cabinet's approval, the Premier sent a letter to Moshe Sharett, chairman of the Jewish Agency executive, asking explanation of Dr. Goldmann's actions.

The letter questioned the meeting Dr. Goldmann had previously with Phillips Talbot, United States Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs, on Israel's project to divert waters of the Jordan River.

Dr. Goldmann said that he had no wish to interfere in matters that were primarily Israel's concern, but that in this case he had advised the Israeli Embassy in Washington in advance of the meeting, and that he actually had done their bidding, reports the New York Times.

"An Embassy official indicated certain steps which would be desirable," Dr. Goldmann said, "so when Mr. Talbot referred to this issue in our conversation I put forward the idea to which the Israel Embassy official had referred, and suggested to Mr. Talbot that it might be pursued.

Soviet Response To Jew Hatred Charge Is Letter By Five Jews To Show Role Of Their Group In Russian Life

The Soviet Union has made public statistics showing that Jews play a role in Soviet intellectual and scientific life that is disproportionately large in relation to their numbers in the population. The distribution of the data appears to be part of a propaganda effort to refute recent foreign charges that the Soviet Government is guilty of deliberate anti-Semitic acts.

In another move that seems to be related to this counter-offensive, the Soviet press has recently announced the promotion of Gen. Yakov G. Kreizer to general of the army, writes Harry Schwartz, in the New York Times. This promotion apparently makes General Kreizer the highest-ranking Jewish military figure in the Soviet Union since Trotsky organized the Red Army after the Bolshevik Revolution.

The key Soviet response to the charges of anti-Semitism was in the form of a letter written by five Soviet Jews and widely distributed in Europe and the Western Hemisphere by the Soviet press agency Novosti.

The letter, which contains statistics about Soviet Jews that have not appeared in Soviet statistical handbooks, is signed by a writer, Z. Vendrof; a composer, Lev Pulver; the editor of a magazine dealing with Asia and Africa, Prof. Iosik Braginsky; a member of the Soviet Academy of Medical Sciences, Prof. Ilya Strashun; and a legal scholar, Prof. Boris Eidelman.

The letter's basic contention is that the attacks on Soviet policy toward Jews are devoid of foundation because, although Jews constitute only one-point-one per cent of the Soviet Union's population, they make up a far larger percentage of the country's intellectual élite.

The following statistics are presented in the letter:

Of 2,395,545 university undergraduates in the Soviet Union last year, 77,177 were Jews. This is somewhat more than three per cent of the total.

Among Soviet specialists with secondary and higher education, there are 427,000 Jews. This is said to be a much higher percentage for the Jews than, for example, for the Byelorussian and Georgian populations in the Soviet Union.

The letter also said that there were 33,529 Jewish scientists in the Soviet Union, apparently about 10 per cent of the total number, says the New York Times. It adds that Jews constitute 14.7 per cent of all Soviet doctors; 8.5 per cent of all writers and journalists; 10.4 per cent of all lawyers and judges; and 7 per cent of all workers in the arts.

The letter asserts that 7,623 Jews were elected as deputies to local organs of the Soviet Government in 1961 and that there are Jewish Deputies to the national Supreme Soviet (Parliament) as well as to the Supreme Soviets of some of the Soviet republics.

Besides General Kreizer, the letter cites a number of prominent Jews, including Veniamin E. Dymshits, the new Chairman of the State Planning Committee (Gosplan); Ilya Ehrenburg, the author; and Ilya Yagudin, a collective farm chairman.

Most of the data in the letters cover fields for which no similar statistics have been issued since the start of World War II. The one major exception is the figure on scientists, which appears to check reasonably well with data on this field issued in the late Nineteen Fifties.

The letter, which is not known to have appeared in any Soviet publication, asserts that the Soviet Government "made heroic efforts to save many hundreds of thousands of Jewish families" from the Nazis during World War II.

It also denies that there is any discrimination against the Jewish religion in the Soviet Union and asserts that a decline in the num-

Death Of Yiddish Poet Is Loss To Jewry

The life and work of Ida Massey, of Montreal, an outstanding figure in the field of Jewish letters, was the theme of a memorial night in the Jewish People's Schools, sponsored by the Jewish Writers' Association. Mrs. Massey, who died in Montreal on June 13, was prominent as a writer of Yiddish prose and poetry, as she was as a humanitarian who moved among less fortunate deprived of the material comforts.

Mrs. Massey's age was "around 70." She was the widow of Alexander Massey. Two sons, Earl Massey, and Irving Massey, on the faculty of McGill University, survive. Mrs. Massey was born in Russia, and came to Canada after the turn of the century.

Her poetry began appearing in periodicals in 1925, and some of her poems and literary articles were published throughout the world, and have been translated into English, Russian, and Hebrew. Mrs. Massey was particularly well-known as an author of poems for children, with much of the material adopted by various schools as part of the curriculum.

Her home was a meeting place for the greats of the Jewish literary world, as well as struggling young authors who were encouraged to pursue their careers in the face of adversity. She also maintained a large correspondence with literary contacts in Mexico, Argentina, France, Poland, Israel and the United States. Delegations from Jewish institutions, organizations, and schools attended the funeral services.

During 1961, the president reported, $149,588.00 was loaned to needy families. Repayments received during 1962 from all loans amounted to $138,689.00, and showed the large number of people who are involved in receiving assistance from the Agency. Mr. Caplan also stated that they had been fortunate in meeting the demand of loans applied for, but that in the future the demands of the Free Loan will grow because of the conditions of all small businesses, the labour field, and the diminishing value of the dollar: also that the duty of the board is to raise the capital of the institution. Since the establishment of the agency, capital has increased through the efforts of the members. Donations in 1961 were $13,458. The Agency has co-operated with the United Jewish Welfare Fund, the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society, the Jewish Family and Child Service, and is part of the United Community Fund of Greater Toronto. Mr. Caplan thanked L. Neuschul, executive director, and his secretary, Mrs. Nurit Gluksman. He ended his report by giving a cheque for $1,000, an addition to his established $5,000 fund, in the name of Mr. and Mrs. I. Caplan. Mr. Shindman reported on the donations received by the agency in 1961, amounting to $13,458. Special accounts are established, and loans are given out in the donor's name, so that if an account were carried in the name of Mr. X, the cheque to be given out would carry his name. Donations were from: Barney Goldhar, $4,586, which completed his pledge for $10,000, in the name of J. Barney and Pauline Goldhar Fund; Bernard Weinberg, Q.C., $8,000, completing his pledge of $5,000, to the Mr. and Mrs. B. Weinberg Fund; I. Jack Shindman ended his report with a pledge of $250 in addition to his previously established Trust Fund. James Betesh, chairman of the investigation committee, explained procedure for interviewing applicants, and the special investigations of loans of more than $500 for business purposes only. He said that since May, 1961, until now, fifteen loans were granted of $750 each, and nine loans of $1,000 each. These have been referred by the loan committee to the investigation committee who deal with loans amounting to more than $500. Then, if statements made by the applicants were found to be correct, the loans were granted, otherwise, they were rejected. A. A. Hermant, chairman of the loan committee, read the statement of activities for the first five months of 1962. Julius Weiner, chairman of the nominating committee, recommended for elections to the board of directors for 1962-63; Morris Adams, James Betesh, Nathan Briks, Isador Caplan, Leonard Caplan, Joseph Cohen, J. "I made it clear that I was not speaking for the Government of Israel. Mr. Talbot promised to consider the point and I informed the Israel Embassy accordingly."

"The matter of my visit in Washington," the Zionist leader said, "has been inflated out of all proportions by a wrong procedure and a series of indiscretions by the [Israeli] Government.

"I cannot resist the impression that what occurred for this procedure was an intention to hurt me."

Dr. Goldmann added: "I fully agree with the Government of Israel that it alone is entitled to deal with other governments on matters of concern to the State of Israel, and that neither the World Zionist Organization nor any other Jewish body has the right to intervene in such negotiations unless specifically requested to do so."

Dr. Goldmann said he believed he was justified in meeting with Mr. Talbot because he "did not intend to discuss any concrete problems, but merely the general policy of the United States in the Near East."

Dr. Goldmann declared, according to the New York Times, "In order to avoid further misunderstandings of this nature, I would gladly be prepared to undertake not to raise in future any questions concerning Israel's relations with other governments in talks with either the American Government or that of any other country, and should feel relieved if from now on no such requests were made of me by representatives of Israel."

Newest Jewish Problem: Divorce

BY ALFRED K. ALLAN, OF NEW YORK

Marital strife and divorce are fast becoming major problems for the American Jewish community. Rabbi Isaac Trainin, adviser on religious affairs to the New York Federation of Jewish Philanthropies, told me that sociologists, rabbis, and counselors in the field agree that the Jewish divorce rate is rising very rapidly throughout the country.

From a relatively low rate of one divorce out of ten marriages, it is now nearing the national statistic of one out of four. A rabbi in a suburban New York community says that counselling Jewish couples having serious marital difficulties is now his No. 1 problem.

In an effort to find the reasons for the appearance of this new Jewish problem, and to help troubled Jewish couples, a unique Marriage Counseling Bureau was launched in 1959 by the Conservative movement. The Bureau is actually an outgrowth of a change made in 1954 in the Conservative marriage contract. At that time a paragraph was added requiring every couple to pledge that, in case of marital difficulties, they would return for help to the rabbi who had married them, or his representative. A Beth Din, or religious court, was then established to provide rabbinical counseling to help save marriages that could be saved. (A similar rabbinical court was started in 1958 by the Orthodox Rabbinical Council of America.)

Many leaders of the Conservative movement felt, however, that something more was needed to provide the fullest possible aid to troubled Jewish couples. In the words of Rabbi Bernard Mandelbaum, Provost of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America and Director of its Religio-Psychiatric Center, "There are times when the moral counsel given by a rabbi to an estranged couple does not penetrate because the rabbi does not know that one or both of the couple is psychologically ill."

The Marriage Counseling Bureau was therefore established at the Seminary as a pilot program for a new approach to the entire area of marriage counseling. Now, when a rabbi is confronted with a counseling problem that he feels he isn't fully equipped to handle, he refers the couple to the Bureau, where a trained staff, composed of a marriage counselor, psychiatrist, and rabbi are available. The fact that the couple has been referred to the Bureau by their rabbi, in whom they have great confidence, serves to alleviate any anxiety on their part that the Bureau's methods of help might violate their religious beliefs.

The Bureau has found that the stresses of modern living and the fact that divorce is no longer so great a social stigma as it was years ago, are factors in the rise in marital discord among Jewish couples. However, Dr. Sidney Furst, the Bureau's psychiatric consultant, says: "The main reason is the presence of a psychoneurotic disturbance in one or both of the parties. These disturbances originate in childhood and continue through adolescence. They may remain latent for many years and manifest themselves later in life."

A wife came to the Bureau complaining that her husband was inconsiderate and unsympathetic to her. "He doesn't care for me or for the children," she insisted frantically. Questioning of the husband, however, revealed that the wife had failed to give him reason to believe that she really desired intimate relations with him. This caused him to take revenge by his behavior.

"It is the job of the psychiatrist to trace disturbances like these back to their roots and give the person insight into his problem," says Dr. Furst. "The problem can come from an unstable childhood or behavior disorders, among other causes. They actually run the gamut."

Mrs. Maria H. Mills, the Bureau's marriage counselor, adds: "It's interesting that we have very few instances where the generally accepted causes of marital discord — adultery, gambling, and alcoholism — were present. This would seem to indicate that possibly such types of neglect occur less in Jewish circles. The main problem, we discover, is inability to communicate with each other. Although many couples come to us with complaints that they are having serious religious problems, we have found that the couple is actually only using religion to cover up the basic underlying cause of their strained relationship."

A husband was reaching the point where he wanted to dissolve his marriage. He felt that his wife had become lax in observing Jewish dietary laws and that this indicated a complete disregard on her part for his religious beliefs. Consultations at the Bureau revealed, however, that the wife was actually only "getting back" at her husband for what she felt was his lack of regard for her wishes. "What had appeared to be a religious problem," Mrs. Mills pointed out, "was actually one of personal relations."

Since its inception, the Bureau has had marked success in giving Jewish couples — a number of them wed as long as twenty years but now drifting apart — new insight into marriage.

Another agency that offers aid to troubled Jewish couples is the Jewish Family Service in New York City, part of the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies. In one recent year the agency aided some 14,000 families with both marital and pre-marital counseling, among other family problems.

"Although our experience is with the large Jewish community in New York, we know that the marital problems we encounter are typical of those facing Jewish families in other parts of the country," said Mrs. Florence Beatman, the agency's executive director. She added: "A frequent problem is the sense of isolation each partner feels in the marriage. They don't believe they are getting enough out of it. There's a strong feeling of different goals and values instead of mutual aspirations, and the people find themselves constantly looking for something wrong in their marital partners."

"The marriage will be all right until the first child is born," Mrs. Beatman explained. "Then difficulties arise that strain the couple's relations, because now the marriage relationship must be altered to cope with the new responsibility. If this inability to adjust is left unresolved, then the birth of a second child can cause a definite breakdown in the marriage. The couple needs to be mature enough to face the problems that arise at different stages. Counseling can often resolve these emotional and social problems that might otherwise tear the family apart."

Mrs. Beatman also believes that the big increase in "young marriages" has a definite bearing on the rise in marital strife and divorce among Jews: "The age of the couple is not, of course, always a gauge of their maturity and wisdom. Many young people under twenty-one are sufficiently mature to make a success of marriage. However, all too many 'young marriages' today are based on false and overly-romantic concepts. Both parties need to determine if they are prepared to face the realities of married life, or if they are getting married just because everyone else in their set is, or because their parents are over-anxious to see them married. Pre-marital counseling can be especially useful to such youngsters."

From its wide experience in this field, the Jewish Family Service has formulated a set of safeguards for a secure family life. It includes such things as:

Agreed-upon values rooted in moral and ethical concepts.

General agreement on the rearing of children, and sharing of responsibilities for them, as well as allocating certain responsibilities to them.

Interdependence and a sensible amount of independence. Unity without conformity; the ability to appreciate each other's satisfactions without necessarily having the same interests.

An atmosphere in which pleasures and problems can be shared, but at the same time a respect for privacy.

Exercise of self-discipline by the adults.

Acceptance of all members of the family without necessarily endorsing their behavior. Should a child get into trouble, the family will stand by them without approving his misbehavior. He will not be abandoned when he needs his family most.

An interest in and concern for other people.

How can people outside the New York area obtain help with their marital problems? If they are affiliated with a congregation they should first go to their rabbi. If he believes their problem is such that he cannot adequately handle it, he will refer them to trained people who can.

The Jewish Theological Seminary of America recently established a special two-year course in human behavior, taught by psychiatrists, for all of its rabbinical students. The organized Jewish community should vigorously support the establishment of such forward-looking programs in all rabbinical schools and seminaries.

Rabbi David Silverman, rabbinical consultant to the ITS's Marriage Counseling Bureau, told me, "The organized Jewish community has failed adequately to support counseling programs for estranged Jewish couples. Counseling bureaus should be set up wherever there is a large Jewish population, in a concerted effort to save more troubled Jewish marriages from ending in needless divorce."

SOVIET RESPONSE TO JEW HATRED CHARGE

ber of believers is a result of a growing belief in materialism rather than a result of pressures by the Soviet Government.

The Soviet effort to refute the accusations of discrimination against Jews does not appear, however, to have met directly the specific charges that have been raised in the West.

In recent months these charges have centered on such matters as a prohibition on the baking of matzoh by stateowned bakeries; and the high proportion of Jews among persons reported in the Soviet press to have been arrested for serious economic crimes and sentenced to death, says the New York Times. Western concern has also been expressed about charges by Moscow that synagogues in the Soviet Union have been employed as centers for Israeli intelligence activity against the Soviet regime.
